New Power for Work Epilogue: Leading People to Integrate Faith and Work Notes Acknowledgments In 1957, I experienced a spiritual awakening that led me to a more fulfilling life. As a token of gratitude, I humbly asked God to give me the means to spread joy through music. Through His grace, this wish has been granted. This album is a humble offering to Him, a way to express my thanks through our work, just as we do with our hearts and words. May He guide and strengthen everyone in all good endeavors. —John Coltrane Being called to serve God could mean putting an end to my career ambitions and comforts as I saw two brothers become missionaries overseas. One of them lived in rural Africa, far from the luxuries of modern life. If I wanted to truly put God first, I needed to be open to serving him anywhere. And that's exactly what happened - a few weeks after my decision, my boss fell ill and asked me to take over leadership of the company, which I took as a sign from God to serve in the business world instead. For the next decade, I led companies in New York City, Europe, and Silicon Valley, wrestling with what it meant to be called to serve God as a leader. Redeemer's teachings had given me some guidance - that I should be changed by Jesus' gospel and used by God in my relationships and leadership style. But how did that look in practice? The examples were few, often outdated like relics from a time when going to church was the norm. One CEO kept a Bible on his desk, while another prayed and their company thrived. Many saw their jobs as a means to make money for charity, and pastors and businesspeople often said a Christian's main job in the workplace was to evangelize colleagues.
